Thank You,
My Friend

By MARTHA K. DAVIS
(McClure Syndicate—WNU Service.)

"I'M TERRIBLY sorry, Tom, but we are having the rector and his wife for dinner."

I don't look my disappointment.

Stranded for a few hours in a western city, I had happily bumped into an old college classmate, Jerry Ross, whom I hadn't seen in years.

Of course nothing would do but I must go to his home for dinner.

"Judy will be mighty glad to see you," he said heartily, and remembering pretty Judith Ross, I experienced a pleasurable anticipation at the thought of meeting her again.

"It will have to be 'eat and run,'" I said.

"My train leaves at eight, forty and I simply have to make it."

I found Judith charming as ever and the thought of a few hours' visit with these old friends was decidedly gratifying.

Now, when my hostess announcing the impending arrival of a handsome rector and his probably equally handsome wife.

"It's a perfect shame it happens this way," deplored Judith, "but you must enjoy meeting Nancy Rathburn. Tom, she isn't the ordinary rector's wife at all."

fascinating, interesting, delightful woman! Everyone adores her. How she never forgets a name!

Rathburn—I Really, I do not believe she could stand him if it weren't for the money she makes.

Every spring she spends a couple of months abroad. She comes back more beautiful than ever, fairly aglow with enthusiasm, and plunges heart and soul into parish work. The things that woman accomplished! Why—last winter—"but Judith's dissertation was interrupted by the arrival of her guests."

The Reverend George Rathburn was all that my hostess had implied. Pompous—conceited—arrogant. But for all his bluster he was a beautiful fad in insignificance.

Beautiful, quiet, poised Nancy Rathburn! The money she has is to have specific performance of a contract to purchase a certain tract of real estate in Appomattox County, belonging to R. Childers Wright at the time of his death.
